The Court met at eight o'clock and waited until nearly nine o'clock, when at the request of Messrs. Van Slyke, Coulter, and others, Mr. Carrington put to the servants interrogatories as to expressed a desire to go with their mas ter, and the counsel then stated to the Court that while prepared to do full justice to the merits of the case at the bar he felt that it would be unprofessional and uncandid to argue that any further restraint could be put upon the choice and action of the parties brought in by the writ after their choice was made known. He also stated that it became due to the stranger as a matter of courtesy, as well as right, to permit him to proceed upon his journey without interference or inconveniences. Judge Swan would be decisive in the matter, and that all would acquiesce. The party applying for the writ, C. A. Langton, was ruled to pay the cost of the proceedings. - Columbus Journal.
